Henry Cohn
Microsoft Research New England
"Human-assisted proofs in discrete geometry"

Abstract:

There's a spectrum of proofs involving both human and computer contributions, ranging from those with a purely human architecture but a few machine calculations to those in which the human is merely facilitating the machine's work. In this talk, I'll examine where several recent proofs in discrete geometry fall within this spectrum, and I'll explore the prospects for a few open problems.